Introduction

By Daniel Maliniak, Susan Peterson, Ryan Powers, and Michael J. Tierney

We are pleased to share the results of the third Teaching, Research, and International Policy (TRIP) Snap Poll. With support from the Carnegie Corporation of New York, we field Snap Polls several times a year. Our polls provide real-time data in the wake of significant policy proposals, during international crises, and on emerging foreign policy debates. In this poll, we asked scholars about the probability of war between the United States and major world powers, U.S. foreign policy towards ISIS, the international community's ability to respond to global financial or health crises, and immigration. A related essay identifying some interesting patterns and raising new questions is published on ForeignPolicy.com.

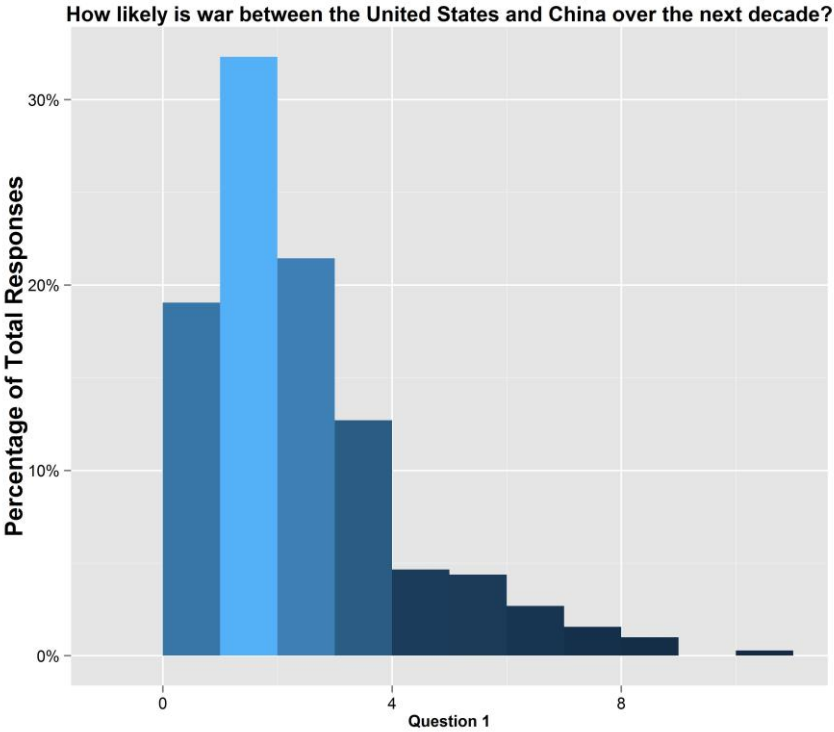

How TRIP Snap Polls work

TRIP Snap Polls survey all IR scholars in the United States. To be included in our sample, individuals must be employed at a U.S. college or university in a political science department or professional school and teach or conduct research on issues that cross international borders. To date we have identified 4,185 individuals who fit these criteria. The Snap Poll was open from September 9–November 3, 2014 along with a larger faculty survey. In this poll, 1,395 scholars responded to at least one of our ten questions, a response rate of approximately 33 percent with a margin of error of +/- 2.14%. The number of responses to each question is listed below. We compared the demographic makeup of our respondent pool against the total population of IR scholars in the United States, which is provided at the end of this report. The sample is representative of the field in terms of gender and professorial rank, but slightly over-represents IR scholars at large research universities (R1s). The results below are not weighted to correct for this, but our internal analysis showed that weighted results are statistically indistinguishable from the results we present here.
